The Gamecocks defeated the SEC-leading LSU Tigers 94-83 Wednesday in Ben Simmons’ much-anticipated appearance at Colonial Life Arena. The freshman forward from Australia picked up two early fouls, which led to his benching for the final eight minutes of the first half. Simmons, guarded primarily by Chris Silva in the first half, had just five points and four assists at halftime. Simmons did most of his damage in the second half, however, as LSU’s primary ball handler. He began the second half with three straight baskets, including an and-1 dunk that narrowed LSU’s deficit to five after it ballooned up to nine early on.

“We made some defensive mistakes, which we’ll watch on film, on Simmons in the second half. I thought we defended him well in the first half. Our help defense wasn’t clean in the first half, but we defended him well,” head coach Frank Martin said. The highly touted NBA prospect finished the game with 20 points, six rebounds and six assists, but missed a key free throw with 57 seconds remaining.

Senior forward Michael Carrera was also in foul trouble early, picking up two fouls in the first half. Martin played Carrera for just two minutes in the first half, forcing him out of rhythm early on.

Carrera recovered down the stretch, along with point guard PJ Dozier, to lead the Gamecocks to victory. The two combined for 24 points and five rebounds in the second half.

“PJ’s a beautiful kid, just an unbelievable, beautiful kid. And I’ve said this from the beginning: The best part about him is that he wants me to coach him,” Martin said.

Carrera was honored prior to tipoff for surpassing 1,000 career points. Foulks were an issue for both teams with three players fouling out and a total of 56 personal fouls between the two teams. The Tigers missed 12 of their 28 free throw attempts. Silva, Mindaugas Kacinas and Craig Victor III fouled out.

Junior guard Sindarius Thornwell followed up a season-best performance against Texas A&M with another strong performance, scoring a game-high 24 points — six in the final minute. Thornwell shot 40 percent from the field, but hit 11 of his 14 free throws to secure the win. LSU’s other freshman standout, Antonio Blakeney, led the Tigers in scoring, with 22 points on 4-6 three-point shooting.

The victory moves South Carolina atop the SEC standings with Kentucky narrowly trailing. John Calipari’s Wildcats are next up, scheduled to tip off at noon Saturday.

Column: Johnny Football needs to exit

Bobby Balboni
@ROB_BALBONI

Who doesn’t love a good scandal? Especially as members of the media, we live to dig up the dirt. The world of sports has more than its fair share of Hamlets and Achilles, the wonderboy phenoms who eventually fall victim to their tragic vices. We have Deflategate, performance enhancing drug accusations and recruiting violations. There is one scandal we have to turn our back on though, one sick individual who needs a dose of tough love.

Lending Cleveland Brown’s quarterback Johnny Manziel our attention is only enabling him at this point, not helping him. Manziel was simply seen as a rebel during his time at Texas A&M, the bad boy who didn’t abide by the NCAA’s rules. He won a Heisman trophy and broke records, then screwed up and we wrote about it — rinse, wash and repeat. He was just a college kid who partied too much, and other than his supreme talent on the gridiron, not all that different than his peers. Manziel is an adult now, and a dangerous one at that.

Since his relevance as a football player has declined, his behavior as a human being has become exponentially worse. Manziel not only ruptured ex-girlfriend Colleen Crowley’s eardrum in an altercation last month, he allegedly threatened to take her life along with his own.

Manziel will do anything to stay relevant. The drinking, the lies and the cover-ups aren’t enough for him anymore though. The most insightful thing that anyone has said about Manziel came from former NFL quarterback Ryan Leaf. Last week, Leaf encouraged Manziel to seek help on an interview with KESN-FM when he said, “You don’t want to be vulnerable because you’re this big, strong football player, and help means weak. And it doesn’t. Asking for help might be the strongest thing you will ever do.”

If anyone can relate to Manziel, it is Leaf. Drafted No. 2 overall in the 1998 NFL draft behind Peyton Manning, Leaf’s professional career flamed out after just three seasons. Leaf has since served two terms in prison and developed a dangerous drug addiction to Vicodin. The parallels between their stories are eerily similar.

The nonstop media coverage is really hurting Manziel more than anything at this point. He craves the attention, feeds off of it even. Instead of speculating whether or not Manziel’s football career is over, he needs to disappear for a while and straighten himself out. He needs help, but not our attention. That might mean going home to his family, entering rehab or even jail. The brand and intrigue surrounding Johnny Football is stone cold dead. If things don’t change soon, Johnny Manziel might follow his image to the grave.

Women came together to show how supporting Bernie Sanders and being a feminist are not mutually exclusive positions at Women for Bernie on Wednesday.

Recently, there has been an uproar of criticism toward women who support Bernie Sanders over Hillary Clinton, claiming they do not support feminism. Many at the event disclaim this notion, stating they are not misinformed on their decision. Anna Mesa, a public health graduate student, made her objections to this known.

“There’s been a lot of backlash against women who are supporting Bernie instead of Hillary, and I think that that’s a little ridiculous. Bernie is also very strong in women’s issues,” Mesa said.

Women for Bernie is a nationwide event, and hosted meet-ups on the same day and time all over the United States on Wednesday. The event featured a video message from Sen. Nina Turner, as well as local speakers discussing different aspects of what Sanders plans to assist.

Local speakers included Virginia Sanders, a South Carolina progressive activist, who spoke on raising the minimum wage; Dr. Emilio Perez-Jorge, who spoke on the universal healthcare; and Bryanta Booker, president of Young Democrats of South Carolina and chairwoman of the Young Leaders for Bernie, who spoke on the issues faced in getting more people to vote. Nurses for Bernie, sponsored by National Nurses United for Patient Protection, was also present at the event.

The public meet-up in Columbia was hosted by a private party at the Lourie Center. Elaine Cooper, a co-host of the Columbia event and a longtime volunteer for the Bernie campaign, spoke in reference to the event.

“I think there’s something like 127 locations in 37 different states, including Alaska, going on at the same time, and I know I am the only one who’s live-streaming the event,” Cooper said. “Of course with that I hope to widen out the audience. We’re just having a bunch of different events to raise awareness.”

The Women for Bernie meet-up was an informative event that came in time for the upcoming Democratic preliminaries on Feb. 27.
Rubio focuses on SC primary at town hall

Marco Rubio joined U.S. Rep. Trey Gowdy at the Columbia Metropolitan Convention Center Wednesday afternoon for a town hall meeting before the highly anticipated South Carolina primary on Feb. 20.

“South Carolina is a place for new beginnings and fresh starts, and we also happen to pick presidents,” Gowdy said.

He expressed his respect for Rubio’s campaign and said, “South Carolina, let me tell you this: If we nominate Marco Rubio, I promise you he will be the next president of the United States.

This was followed by a “Marco” chant from the audience, which was made up of students, campaign volunteers and other Rubio supporters.

“I see a passion in him. I think he’s passionate in what he believes in, and I think that he’s strong in his ideas. I like his ideas. I support his policies … It seems to me like he could be our future. He’s young, and when he speaks I feel like he really cares about the country and really knows what he’s talking about,” Alison Trimble, first-year international studies student, said.

Rubio talked about his presence in South Carolina and how he spends a lot of time here, not only as a political figure, but also with his family as a halfway point between Miami and D.C.

“I have a good friend of mine that coaches basketball here at the university, some of you might know him — his name is Frank Martin. Did you know Cubans coach basketball?” Rubio said.

He stressed the importance of South Carolina voters: “Record turnout in New Hampshire. Record turnout in Iowa. It’s going to be a record turnout in South Carolina.”

Rubio spent time pointing out the danger the country is facing due to increased government involvement in health care, education and religion and the repercussions the nation will face if it is not changed.

“If we fail now, they’ll put three more liberals on the Supreme Court, and our Constitution is in a lot of trouble. If we fail now, the debt will continue to grow, and we will have a debt crisis. If we fail now, and they win, they will continue to destroy our military capabilities, and we will be less safe and less influential in the world. We have to get it right, and we have to get it right now in this election,” Rubio said.

Rubio also gave his thoughts on the democratic presidential candidates, saying that Bernie Sanders is a socialist and Hillary Clinton is not fit for the job.

“She’s not qualified to be president of the United States, because anyone who takes classified information and puts it on a private server cannot be president of the United States, because she thinks she’s above the law,” Rubio said.

The event ended sooner than expected because Rubio had to get back to D.C. to vote on North Korean sanctions, but he assured the audience he would be spending so much time in South Carolina in the next nine to 10 days that he would have to pay a property tax.

“We can’t lose this election, which means we have to nominate someone who can win, but not just anyone who can win. It has to be someone who is truly a conservative that embraces limited government and free enterprise and a strong national defense — but who can win. That’s why I’m here: to ask you for your vote. I’m the conservative in this race that can win,” Rubio said.
Trump talks economic concerns, tactics at Clemson

Emily Barber @EMILYRISA

Given the personality seen from 2016 presidential hopeful Donald Trump, it’s unsurprising that his supporters are just as enthusiastic and raucous as he is. They turned up in full force to hear him review the highlights of his campaign at Clemson University’s T. Ed Garrison Arena on Wednesday evening.

After a brief introduction from South Carolina Lt. Gov. Henry McMaster, Trump took the stage, accompanied by The Beatles’ “Revolution.” He began by discussing his recent win in the New Hampshire primary on Monday.

“The reason [we won] is that people are tired of losing in this country,” he said. “We’re losing all the time. People are tired of stupidity, incompetence — we’re not going to have it anymore.”

In between humorous digressions in which he complimented the audience or wondered at the size of the crowd, Trump reviewed his campaign success so far and reflected on his transition of focus from business to politics.

“I’ve been in politics all my life, but I’ve been ... a supporter,” he said. “And one of the things we’re doing and one of the things I’m doing is I’m self-funding my campaign, so I can’t be bought.”

From this, he segued into a criticism of competing Republican candidate Jeb Bush’s campaign budget, which dramatically exceeds Trump’s own and is disproportionate to his success so far. Trump said that he felt it was important to fund his campaign independently because he had been acquiring money all his life and felt this was the point to stop being greedy for it.

“I want to be greedy, but I want to be greedy for the United States. We want to bring money into the United States,” he said. He plans to separate himself from the business he has built and transfer the responsibilities to his children and executives.

One of the biggest problems in the United States that Trump believes needs to be fixed is the debt, which increases regularly due to trade deficits with other countries. He warned against an impending economic crash to which the United States is vulnerable because it is so connected to foreign economies.

“We are sitting on a very dangerous bubble,” he said. “We’re so tied into China ... When they go bad, we go bad, and the whole thing is ridiculous.”

He also discussed a phenomenon he called “corporate inversion,” which is when companies native to the United States shut down their American manufacturers and move to other countries.

“Companies have ... closer to $5 trillion outside of this country,” he said. “The companies can’t get their money back in ... The Democrats ... agree and the Republicans agree: We are going to bring the money back. They can’t get a deal done ... because we don’t have a leader as a president.”

According to Trump, the United States spends more per student on education than any other country, and yet the education system is ranked below some developing countries. He drew a parallel between Bush’s high spending and lack of campaign success to that of the United States on education.

Another of his points was the negotiation of prices for prescription drugs. Currently, the United States does not negotiate, and Trump said that the people could save $300 billion if the government started doing so.

Trump blames politicians’ lack of initiative on their reliance on money from companies. Career politicians often rely on money from outside sources, and therefore they have to abide by expectations of those sources.

“The politicians will never get you to the promised land,” he said. “They’re preservationists ... They’re good at getting re-elected. They’re great at getting money. They’re great at getting all of this stuff, and they’ll never help you.”

As a solution to these economic challenges, Trump would start having more people from business backgrounds involved in policy-making. He would be stricter on American companies that try to move manufacturing plants out of the country and would work to reduce the exorbitant annual deficits the U.S. owes to other countries.

He also criticized foreign policy decisions such as the Iran nuclear deal and the way the administration handled Iran’s recent capture and release of 10 American sailors, which was preceded by the publication of a video showing the sailors held at gunpoint.

“We’re going to make our country so wonderful again, and you people can be so proud of our country again,” he said. “We’re not going to have deals where our sailors are put on their knees with their hands up.”

Throughout the speech, the audiences responded to Trump’s most characteristic quotes with excitement that filled the huge, vaulted ceilings of the rodeo arena. Just as bullfighters must carefully calculate their moves in the arena, so Trump and the other presidential candidates will have to in the political arena in the coming weeks and months.

For now, until the South Carolina Republican primary on Feb. 20, that arena will be South Carolina and the candidates will be fighting down to the very last vote.
Engineers Without Borders, an organization at USC founded in June 2010, offers hands-on opportunities for engineers and other professions to work directly with communities in need by working on projects locally and internationally.

Since their first year, they have finished an international project in the town of La Victoria, Ecuador. They constructed a one-kilometer irrigation pipeline to aid local agribusiness.

“The main impact of the project has been that it has allowed the community to be more financially stable. Before the construction of the pipeline, the community had a stable supply of water for only three months out of the year. With the construction of the pipeline, the community now has a stable supply of water all year long,” project lead Eric Reyes-Bastida said.

The other benefit from this project was that the water they helped the town secure went to a high school in the area and was used to educate the students on different agricultural methods. By doing this, the money that the school made from the crops cultivated by students went directly back to the school and taught them about engineering by providing them with skills they can use for the rest of their lives.

“EWB-USC, while continuing to monitor progress on this project, has now moved its focus to a new project in El Cedro, Ecuador, where a team of students and a professional will conduct a site assessment over spring break. The goal is to build a safe, reliable water supply for the town because it lacks the engineering knowledge to put this in place itself.

“I became involved with EWB because I grew up in a small town in Mexico where we did not have many of the things we often take for granted in the U.S. I never liked that problems that are relatively ‘simple’ to solve in the U.S. are abundant in developing countries. Being the project lead allows me to use my technical knowledge as well as other resources we have here at USC to help communities in developing countries who are in need,” Reyes-Bastida said.

In the future, EWB-USC hopes to grow large enough to establish a second project team that could work in a different part of the world. Many of the best chapters around the U.S. have multiple project teams. They also would like to increase communication and share ideas with other chapters in the Southeast.

The organization is accepting new members, and you don’t have to be an engineer to join and participate.

“Specifically, we look for highly motivated students who can excel in a team environment and who have an interest in public health and humanitarian work, particularly in developing countries. For those interested in joining us, just swing by our weekly meetings in Swearingen 2A27 on Mondays at 6:30 where you can learn more about committees you’d be most interested in working on, and dive right in!” EWB-USC President Aidan Brougham-Cook said.
Chester, a South Carolina secret, enchants its visitors with its quiet, quaint atmosphere. Visitors can find refuge in its hidden beauty; it’s the perfect place to relax and unwind for a few days.

For a calming getaway, guests can stay at An Inn on York Street. This 19th-century bed-and-breakfast, run by a hospitable English couple, offers a comfortable visit at a reasonable price of $95 per night on Airbnb.

Nothing short of a classic mansion, the edifice is stunningly constructed with timeless creaky wood floors, dazzling chandeliers, ornately carved staircases, elegant furniture and impeccable decor. Each guest room in the house is themed after a famous writer, such as Oscar Wilde, Ernest Hemingway or Mark Twain, and decorated accordingly with their works and studies.

The Inn on York Street is a uniquely charming lodging option for a trip to Chester.

In the evenings, guests can take a dip in the backyard pool, smoke cigars on the porch or catch the ice cream truck as it trundles by, and, in the mornings, visitors awake to the tantalizing smells of home-cooked breakfast wafting up the stairs. Guests are usually served a decadent three-course breakfast, starting with a fruit such as candied peaches, baked pears or strawberries with granola. The second course is usually brioche toast, pastries or cinnamon cake and a choice of coffee or tea. The third and final course is usually an English-inspired traditional dish. Guests may enjoy dishes such as eggs Benedict, fried ham, bacon and eggs, and fresh sausage patties with biscuits.

Equally quaint, if somewhat less sophisticated, downtown Chester is intriguingly old-fashioned. Most of the shops are antique or outdated, yet have a certain charm about their simplicity, recalling a slower pace of life. Visitors can stop by an old appliance store, search through dusty antique stores and visit the tiny farmers market, where friendly locals run booths selling honey and greens.

Summit Food and Spirits, which the Inn on York hostess says is the local favorite, is an affordable and tasty dining option in the downtown area. This restaurant is a perfect picture of the calm atmosphere and easygoing personalities of the residents of Chester. Another favorite is Umi, a sushi and hibachi place with some of the best sushi ever and prices much lower than similar restaurants.

Chester is a place with enough character to enchant you all by itself, but if you want an adventurous night out, Charlotte is only an hour away.

In charming Chester, visitors are encouraged to put their minds at ease in the slow-paced mentality of the small town. Nothing beats the relaxing simplicity of discovering this hidden gem, learning about its history, exploring new restaurants and getting to know other B&B guests at An Inn on York.

Mayor Bloomberg could revolutionize US politics

There is an air of disdain about the American electorate. A collective sense of settling for less pervades the political discourse as we unenthusiastically observe our motley field of candidates. It seems as if we are not choosing the best future president, but the most acceptable among a cohort of otherwise uninspiring and lackluster politicians. Selecting our commander in chief, a process that should be riveting, more closely resembles deciding whether or not to eat the questionable sloppy Joe leftovers from Tuesday.

Essentially, we are given a choice between a rock and a hard place. The Republican front runner is a xenophobic billionaire who, despite our most vehement wishes, shows no intention of dropping out. The Democrats will nominate either a self-proclaimed socialist and hopeless idealist, or a contested war criminal with a track record spottier than your standard leopard. The prospects of electing an inspiring president are undeniably grim.

However, perhaps we spoke too soon. Although they have not yet been confirmed, there are whisperings of an independent candidate entering the race, a candidate who could provide solace for the wearisome and beleaguered American voters — a candidate that adheres not to party lines, but to his own moral code. A Bloomberg candidacy could be exactly what America has been waiting for.

For those who are not well acquainted with former New York City mayor Michael Bloomberg, let's address the elephant in the room: He's a billionaire, with a net worth approximately nine times that of Donald Trump. Bloomberg acquired his fortune via Bloomberg LP, a media and technology company he founded in 1981. Unlike Trump, Bloomberg has used his considerable wealth to promote the arts, education and environmental sustainability through his foundation, Bloomberg Philanthropies.

Once a Republican, then a Democrat and now an independent, Bloomberg is no party stooge, a fact his political track record makes abundantly clear. His is a unique mix of republican economics and democratic social policy, a refreshing combination that unites the historically disparate and irreconcilable party ideologies.

A look at his liberal side reveals that, in 2006, Bloomberg recognized abortion as a fundamental human right. He supported gay marriage as early as 2007 (six years before Hillary did), recognizes the important economic role of immigrants (even the illegal ones) and is notoriously passionate about reducing obesity in the United States.

The best of his fiscal conservatism came to light in 2007 when he turned New York City’s $5 billion deficit into a $4 billion surplus by eliminating unnecessary city agencies and increasing property taxes. Perhaps he could use a similar approach in reducing our $19 trillion national debt.

Unconstrained by party allegiances and with an affinity for the controversial and difficult (two words most politicians shy away from), Bloomberg offers the American people a candidate we don’t have to settle for. A Bloomberg presidency would be a welcome relief from the partisan politics of the past eight years and could bring together a country presently lacking in unity. While Sanders, Trump or Clinton would most certainly increase hostilities across the aisle, Bloomberg’s distinct brand of politics is one voters and legislatures alike can rally behind. A Bloomberg candidacy would turn leftover Tuesday, a buffet of unappealing and ambiguous politicians, into good ol’ Chicken Finger Wednesday.

The University of South Carolina is an equal opportunity institution.
I get asked a fair bit why we never seem to get good presidential candidates. The answer is probably that almost no one can stand tall with partisan forces determined to rip them apart. Even good, fairly reasonable men such as John Kerry, John McCain and Mitt Romney have been torn apart and demonized in recent cycles. But this time things feel a little different. We might really have fields of bad candidates.

Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders would start at war with a Congress that loathes them. Donald Trump is Donald Trump. Ted Cruz has a penchant for making enemies. While there have been some genuinely good candidates in the mix, they have tended to stay low in the polls and earn the scorn of their party’s bases when they rise.

Honestly, I think there are only two candidates who could span the partisan divide and get to work on America’s most pressing problems. One of them, Michael Bloomberg, I am wary of due to his Wall Street ties and history with Stop-and-Frisk. The other is former Sen. Jim Webb.

The only thing you probably remember about Jim Webb is that he appeared in the first Democratic debate and talked about the time he killed a man. More accurately, he alluded to the time he took out three bunkers of enemy soldiers and threw himself in front of a grenade for a friend. He was awarded a Navy Cross, a Silver Star and two Purple Hearts for it.

After Vietnam, he became Ronald Reagan’s Secretary of the Navy and Assistant Secretary of Defense. Webb resurfaced politically in the mid-2000s and won one of Virginia’s Senate seats. He used his position to draft the modern GI bill and advocate for reform of the criminal justice system. Webb’s policy positions don’t cleanly fall in line with either party’s. He has stated that, “We cannot tax ourselves into prosperity,” but his platform has a major emphasis on fairness and bringing CEO pay down and workers’ up. He wants to lower tax rates while eliminating deductions, which is more commonly associated with fiscal conservatives than liberals. But his website also talks favorably about FDR’s approach to unemployment.

Abroad, Webb prefers to stay out of wars when possible. When wars must be fought, he is adamant that our veterans must be cared for. He’s generally liberal on social issues such as abortion and LGBT rights, but he doesn’t place much emphasis on them in his campaign.

This leads into the primary reason I prefer Webb to Bloomberg. The latter, for all of his merits, is tainted by allowing and defending a system where police could detain and search people of color without accusing them of a crime. Bloomberg furthered systemic oppression. Webb is definitely not perfect on the issue; he’s given cringeworthy statements on Black Lives Matter, affirmative action and the Confederate flag. He also tends to discuss criminal justice in non-racial terms. But he has at least taken prominent stands to recognize African American veterans and is married to a person of color.

Really, though, the reason to back Webb has less to do with his stances and more to do with his character. Our nation faces real problems in terms of infrastructure, health care, the justice system and the debt. Congress needs to act soon or we will all suffer later. Will Republicans listen to a socialist or a Clinton? Will Democrats stand by and refuse to filibuster Cruz or Trump? Webb, with his service on the battlefield and in the Reagan administration, could gain Republicans’ respect. And through his more liberal stances on income inequality and other issues he could get Democrats to go along. Jim Webb is an experienced and serious leader who could earn respect across the political aisle.

As an independent candidate without billions in the bank, he faces long odds. But I will take those odds over Congress getting its act together under almost any major party candidate.
