ERRATA

In our attempt to come into step with computer technology, and thus to give readers of Studies in Scottish Literature a publication which looks nicer and is easier to read, as well as to keep our costs down, we were obliged to learn an entirely new method of book production. Unfortunately a slipup occurred which was not noticed until after the volume was published and the error was drawn to our attention. When ellipses split at the end of a line it caused the computer to delete the following line. Volume 20 has since been rechecked and as far as we are able to ascertain the deletions noted below occurred. The editor apologizes to the authors and to his reading public for this mistake.

On page 85. For "the Text's plurality does not depend on the ambiguity of its contents" read "the Text's plurality does not depend on the ambiguity of its contents" (Harari's translation, p. 76).

On page 232. For "what distinguishes Stevenson" Indeed, read "what distinguishes Stevenson . . . is that he was not eagerly ready to be stultified."³ Indeed,

On page 285. For "arguably . . . fiction to have appeared in Scotland" read "arguably . . . the most exuberantly unusual and inventive work of fiction to have appeared in Scotland"
