PREFACE

Like my publisher, I regret the fact that, with this volume, the articles in Studies in Scottish Literature are no longer set in type on that sturdy old wonderfull warhorse of North American publishing, the Linotype machine. The unobtrusive haadsomeness and justified margins of traditional typesetting have become too expensive for such a specialized publication. I hope that readers will rejoice with me that a thrifty combination of the typewriter and the camera at least makes it possible for SSL to continue to convey the kind of information and comment it has been its business to convey for fifteen years, and to do so at a price that is not outlandish. SSL has never made a profit for its publishers, but the new format is expected to make it possible to keep the loss within tolerable limits. Scientists have long been accustomed to reading the more specialized monographs of their colleagues in the form of replicated typescripts, but we "Humanists" (in this context, I find the quotation marks irresistible) have been slower to accept such a shirt-sleeves-rolled-up expedient. We can, of course, lament the high prices and low budgets that are now driving Historians, Literary Critics, and Philosophers to the economies of Engineers and Chemists, but we might be wiser to be glad that people who set type for a living are no longer underpaid.

The first twelve volumes of SSL were issued as a quarterly journal. It now becomes a hardcover book more suitable for the shelves of reference libraries and printed on paper that, in the opinion of Chemists, will last for hundreds of years. Let us hope the Chemists are right.
