Program offers internships for scholars

Capstone partners with Career Center to connect students with community employers

The Capstone Scholars Program is partnering with the Career Center to offer a new benefit to its students.

The Capstone Community Internship Program has been recently developed to provide internship opportunities specifically for freshman and sophomore Capstone Scholars.

Funded by Capstone and facilitated by Career Center’s services, the program will help scholars prepare for and secure paid summer internships, according to David DeWeil, assistant principal of the Capstone Scholars Program.

“ ‘I’m really excited for the students. As much as the university talks about outside of the classroom education and experience, this is meeting that need in another way’,” DeWeil said. “ ‘I think for current Capstone Scholars and for prospective students, it’s another great way to build someone’s employability to make them a strong candidate for when graduate.’”

According to DeWeil, students will work 240 hours for 12 weeks over the summer, and Capstone will match the employer’s funding for students’ pay to equal at least minimum wage.

Depending on Capstone’s funds available for the program, which is still being determined, the program will sponsor internships for a minimum of four students, DeWeil said.

Beyond the funding aspect, the Capstone Community Internship Program will operate essentially the same as the Career Center’s Special Community Internship Program.

“What we’re doing is remaking this as an exclusive Capstone opportunity,” DeWeil said. “They can go to Career Center and apply for internships. What we’re doing is saying we’re going to carve out a number for Capstone Scholars. And marketing it to them, it seems like students take advantage of it more when it’s kind of more of a special opportunity.”

Housing selections begin for Fall 2013

325 Honors students to choose rooms Saturday

On-campus housing room selections for upperclass Honors College students begin tomorrow.

Returning students approved for residence in any of the other living and learning communities, including business, Capstone Scholars, green and international, have already begun to select their rooms assignments by appointment, according to Housing Director Joe Fortune.

This process will continue until March 1.

From 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday, the first round of Honors students who have been approved for residence in the Honors learning community will choose their rooms for next fall on the Honors Quad and in the Honors Residence Hall.

Selection appointments were assigned by a lottery conducted by Housing and will be held at the housing office in Patterson Hall.

Fortune said a specific day was set aside for Honors students to select their rooms because they are the newest group of students to move in.

AUTISM

Beaudet speaks as Caskey lecturer Thursday evening

A noted researcher and professor said that adding more of a special ammonium compound during pregnancy could reduce cases of autism.

Dr. Arthur L. Beaudet of Baylor’s Department of Molecular and Human Genetics spoke Thursday evening in the Lumpkin Auditorium in the Moore School of Medicine.

Too little of the quaternary ammonium compound carnitine in the brain, also known as neuronal dysfunction deficiency (NDDC), can be a contributing cause of autism in children, Beaudet said, and a possible preventative measure would be to supplement diet with foods containing carnitine.

“ ‘Carnitine supplementation during infancy would present 50 to 20 percent cases of autism,’” Beaudet said. “ ‘Children will only benefit if the treatment is done early on.’”

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, as of 2006 children have been diagnosed with an autism spectrum disorder. There has been a 23 percent increase since the CDC report on the disorder in 2007 and a 78 percent increase since its first study in 2000. Beaudet, who graduated from Yale University, presented a study on NDDC primarily on young boys with a mild form of autism.

“ ‘We think that this will provide a clue for the milder form of autism,’” Beaudet said. “ ‘There is a cause, and that is a cause.’”
Computer chief accepts responsibility for hacking

The computer hacking scandal that rocked the South Carolina Department of Revenue last year finally has a name to whom to place some of the blame.

Former Computer Chief Mike Garon said Thursday before a special House committee investigating the security breach that he is "accountable for some element" of the hacking, The State reported.

Department leadership failed to follow Garon’s suggestions to make security a priority, Garon told the committee. Instead, he said, leaders — including former Revenue Director Jim Etter — set aside his recommendations and put the agency’s computer security at risk, according to The State.

Garon acknowledged to the committee that he and other employees should have quickly noticed the breach that leaked millions of Social Security numbers and payment card records from the Department of Revenue’s website.

"I was amazed we did not discover it on our logs," Garon told the committee that he was not the sole cause of the breach that he is "accountable for some element" of the hacking, The State reported.

State representative says he was stopped for DUI

A state representative says Thursday that he was pulled over last fall for driving under the influence after a USC football game.

State Rep. Bakari Sellers, 28, said he was stopped by sheriff’s deputies who saw his car swerving on Interstate 77 in Chester County after the Gamecocks’ win over Georgia on Oct. 7, The State reported.

Sellers said he had his license suspended for six months because he declined to take a Breathalyzer test, but a January hearing dismissed the suspension, The State said.

State may eliminate long-standing raffle ban

The state lottery might not be the only legal form of gambling in South Carolina if voters approve a proposed constitutional amendment.

A Senate panel advanced legislation Wednesday that would allow schools, churches and other nonprofits to hold a limited number of regulated raffles each year, the Greenville News reported.

The state’s raffle ban is commonly understood, but opponents have prevented previous efforts to legalize raffles fearing their effect on "unintended consequences" that changing centuries-old gambling laws may bring, according to the Greenville News.

Raffle opponents apparently support the new legislation, however, because the Greenville Rotary Club is behind the campaign.

The Career Center will do most of the "legwork." DeWeil said, including helping students make employer contacts and prepare for interviews, providing a training session for students after they've been hired and before they begin work and providing a follow-up workshop in the fall.

Carly Edwards, a graduate student of higher education and student affairs who is helping take the lead on the implementation of the project, said she likes seeing the collaboration between Capstone and the Career Center to cater to the educational needs of the Capstone student population.

"Students feel more comfortable accessing and utilizing those resources within a known community," Edwards said.

To be eligible for the Capstone Community Internship Program, students must be freshman or sophomore Capstone Scholars, set up a JobMate profile and attend an information session on Feb. 21.

DeWeil and Edwards said Capstone students have already received preliminary information about the program encouraging them to begin the internship-seeking process using JobMate and the Career Center's preparation resources.

"It's a way to make our Capstone students have more special opportunities just for them," DeWeil said. "We use our funding to be able to carve out additional grants for Capstone Scholars, because many offices just don't have the budget to fund as many as we want. So we throw in some money and create a special fund as many as we want. So we throw in some money and create a special fund as many as we want."

DeWeil said the special grants and programs are drawn for potential new students and their parents.

"If we just said, 'Hey, come to USC and live in a building' — you know, that doesn't really matter," DeWeil said. "It's the educational experience behind it. Making students feel like they belong, that they have someone to talk to no matter what; that's what makes them attracted to this program along with the opportunities."

"If students have not heard about the process, I'd encourage them to get in touch with the housing office. We're trying to follow up with students to ensure we can," Fortune said. "If we're unable to serve you, we're not going to leave you out there alone."

"If students have not received their room assignment offers. Fortune said they will be notified if rooms become available due to other students declining their room assignment offers. Fortune said some students have already declined their invitation for on-campus housing in favor of off-campus alternatives.

On-campus housing for upperclassmen has decreased from about 1,800 beds available last fall due in part to the 141 beds that will be lost when the Women's Quad is closed for upcoming renovation.

"If you're not going to serve you, we're not going to leave you there alone. We have a great off-campus student housing office that will be there to help you."
Internship program gives students good head start

Capstone is launching its Capstone Community Internship Program, a program that allows students to get a head start in the real world. Working in tandem with U.S.C. and the Career Center, the program will allow students to get a taste of what is out there. This is a great opportunity for students to gain knowledge and experience before graduation. The program is open to everybody and it’s a great way to boost one’s resume.

Drone laws need more checks and balances

On Monday, a memo from the Justice Department instrumentarily declaring the assassination of U.S. citizens is being released by NBC News. The “white pages” gives the legal argument behind the death of suspected terrorists Anwar al-Awlaki, who are still American citizens as well as such, seemingly exited from the process. The Obama administration’s stance on the issue is quite alarming, and the legal justification is up to a very high level.

The issue is inextricably linked to Obama’s secret war, the rampant use of drone strikes to kill suspected terrorists from Pakistan to Yemen. The use of drones began under Bush but has escalated under Obama.

The memo sets up three criteria that must be met for a killing to be considered an act of war and legally justifiable. This is a legal argument that has been argued on other cases. The three criteria are 1) an “informed and deliberate decision of the government official” must deem the target a lawful combatant; 2) capture of said suspect must be impossible; and 3) the target of the assassination must be consistent with war principles. This language is much too vague and allows for more room for maneuvering than the public should be comfortable to have.

The high number of civilians that have been killed in the war on terror has been a major point of concern. In order to have a clear picture of the situation, it is necessary to have a clear understanding of the legal framework that governs these operations.

Society must adjust focus to long-term solutions

One of the most pressing concerns today is the shifting of attention by society from long-term solutions to short-term issues, with the latter being given a disproportionate amount of weight in national discussions and solutions. The capitalist Western view of personal gain, which is right on point when he says that the war over control of the Iraq is a war for resources, it is very difficult to justify drone strikes which have killed almost 1000 civilians as consistent with war principles. While al-Awlaki was clearly a terrorist and needed to be taken out, the next person targeted may not be. This process grants an executive the right to conduct a war, and this opportunity to promote acceptance and equality in America’s youth should not be missed.  It would be a mistake to think that the Internet penetration of the United States is perfect. Unfortunately, while the Internet increases the quantity and reach of information, it does not necessitate a high quality of information. Publications such as the Huffington Post are read before its well-acknowledged conclusions and when searching headlines. The two-way interaction may not be a reality, and people have gone too far in re-posting to the new social media, sharing the same type of misinformation that exists on the Internet. The Internet and a fast, multi-tasting way of life in an inseparable characteristic of the members of the millenial generation, we need to be provided in efforts to promote the importance of long-term solutions.

FIVE HEAVY FILMS HIT STORES TUESDAY

High school drama, child abandonment, James Bond, sex surrogates and bullies — all of this and more await in five films coming out on Blu-ray Tuesday.

"The Sessions," "Bully" explore hard issues on big screen

"The Sessions," the documentary about sex surrogates, is releasing the film on Blu-ray and DVD. "Skyfall" is a blast. James Bond is back (from the mediocre "Quantum of Solace") in this rousing, immensely entertaining action film. Daniel Craig, playing Bond for the third time in the series, is already a little old for the role, but the film addresses that in an intelligent, interesting way. Javier Bardem gives a juicy, bizarre performance as Bond’s villain, and Judi Dench is, as always, a top to watch on screen. The Oscar-winning director, Sam Mendes, setpiece, and he’s greatly aided by cinematographer Roger Deakins.

“The Sessions,” which is based on a true story, might not sound like a film many people would want to watch. It’s about a man (John Hawkes) with polio who lives in an iron lung and decides to explore his sexuality by hiring a sex surrogate (Helen Hunt). It may sound like a bad Lifetime movie, but while it does have the trappings of films from that awful channel, this film features amazing performances and deals with sex in a refreshingly frank and mature way.

“Bully” is a documentary that shines a light on the serious problem of bullying in schools. The film follows the lives of a number of school children and shows how bullying has affected them. Tragic cases of young children who have taken their own lives because of bullying provide some of the most moving and alarming moments in the film. Although the film does a very good job showing the victims, it does not try to show the bullies. Why do people bully? What is their motivation? Hearing both sides would have made the film more balanced and provided a deeper understanding of bullying.

Women's basketball picks up 20th win

South Carolina went on the road Thursday night and defeated Alabama 63-53 for its 20th win of the season. The Gamecocks (20-3, 8-2 SEC) are off to their best start since the 2001-02 season. Both sophomore Aligha Welch and senior Ashley Bruner recorded double-doubles in the win. Welch scored a team-high 16 points and grabbed 10 rebounds while Bruner added 15 points and 11 rebounds.

Those post players helped the Gamecocks overcome a poor night at the 3-point line. USC made just two of their 18 attempts.
