Men lose to UK

Riff Raff, originally from Houston, Texas, sold out his concert at Music Farm of Columbia last week.

The audience got progressively more anxious as DJ after DJ took the stage — drunk, sweaty, out of control — drunk, sweaty, screaming fans were ready to throw themselves on the stage at any moment. “Riff Raff! Riff Raff!” The chants seemed to go on forever.

As the crowd grew restless and the pressure mounted, the signaller stepped onto the stage at 9:30 p.m. and announced: “This is Riff Raff!”

The atmosphere was out of control — drunk, sweaty, screaming fans were ready to throw themselves on the stage to get closer to the one-of-a-kind performer. It seems as though most people don’t attend concerts like this one for the music, but rather for the spectacle. As a rapper, he is unquestionably a talented performer.

When Shahan Din saw restaurant employees throwing out all of the leftover food last summer, he knew there was a better use for it. “There’s no reason to waste food,” he said.

New state employee conduct code to ban social media while on job

Starting in July, state employees will be required to follow a new code of conduct that bans social media. The State reported. The code was created in the hopes of instilling public confidence in state government, but penalties for violations of the rules are not specified.

State workers will be prevented from using state resources for personal financial gain, and there will be set restrictions on where state employees can work after they leave their jobs with the state.

“If a public servant has to make a decision on whether something is right or wrong, then our code-of-conduct policy isn’t working,” Republican Gov. Nikki Haley said.

Each agency will have the authority to adjust the new regulations for its employees.

it’s not that difficult. It’s an easy, simple opportunity.”

For Jain, the Food Recovery Network is “more than just meetings” — last week, members gave food to an organization that would hand it out for the first time.

“You get to see your work come to fruition very quickly, which is something that can motivate a lot of people,” Dinsaid. “It’s a really great chance to get in touch with those in need and see how other people live.”

Din and Jain agree the hardest part has been expanding the organization. They currently donate most of the food to God’s Storehouse.

“I don’t consider it leftover food,” said Smiley Tynes from God’s Storehouse. “To know that you have students and that they’re interested in helping the hungry is a blessing.”

Soon, Din and Jain hope to recover food from restaurants in the community and donate it to more organizations.

The queen of avant-garde electronic, Björk, quietly released her ninth studio album Jan. 20, and it's become a sentimental benchmark to her discography. This isn't just any Björk album — "Vulnicura" is the best thing she's produced in years. This is possibly the most powerful work that she's ever released and definitely the most personal. The comments left for her on Facebook proved that this public display of emotion created a serious bond between her and her fans.

Every track on this album has its place, but some of the best are “Quicksand,” “Atom Dance” and the album’s ten-minute coda “Black Lake.”

At eight minutes in length, her fifth track on the album, “Family,” is practically split down the middle into what seems like two songs — there’s a radical beat change around the three minute mark, catching the listener right at the point they might start to fade. She repeats the words “emotional” and “respects” in several songs, as she looks about the tenderness of working through a relationship and keeping her family from tearing apart. She sings lines like, “Maybe he will come out of this / Maybe he won’t” in “Lionsong,” and “Did I love you too much?” in “Black Lake.”

Sometimes an artist’s greatest work is when they’re tormented or troubled, and I believe that she’s this type of artist. We all love catchy songs like “Human Behaviour,” but we’ve never seen her quite like this. If Björk were Leonardo da Vinci, “Vulnicura” would be her “Mona Lisa.”

Björk released her ninth album Tuesday even though it was set to come out in March.

Nothing wrong with apps

Emily Stone
First-year public relations major

Without a doubt, this generation is one that adores all forms of technology. We are connected via social media, through devices like phones and tablets and seem to know what's always going on somewhere in the world.

Take the Charlie Hebdo shooting in Paris, for example. People over in California knew it as soon as it hit the news - the correlation between the two corners of France heard about it - it gives another channel of information for news stations to get their stories out.

Besides finding out news and keeping each other aware of events, apps seem to be constantly evolving to compete.

There are apps for everything and anything. Are some of these apps completely useless? Yes. Could we live without them? Yes. But if we have the option to have something to make our life easier, why not buy or download it?

RunPlus has only been around for a few years, but it seems to be the app for anyone who wants to be a little more fit. It worked out it was convenient to take a bathroom break, there’s only one unnecessary grocery store talk coming to town.

Other apps are purely for our entertainment. A new game that almost everyone seems to love is playing in Trivia Crack. One can find a bunch of random knowledge to see who comes out victorious. The Maps app that comes with the Phone is a practical application. Without an electronic atlas, students would have a harder time getting around.

I’m a South Carolina native, and I still pull out my map app to get to places sometimes — it’s never too bad to have an app to help with studying.

Apps also allow us to carry our computers in our pockets. Someone may think it’s not convenient to have all the time. Any smartphone or tablet can type, have Internet access and can help with studying.

People argue that you too are only dependent on applications. Yes, maybe we are, but they give us a whole new way to do ordinary things. If there isn’t time to do a Target run for index cards to help study, it is possible to find apps that create the flash cards for you.

Now, instead of-heading around with hopping technology, using it and liking it. Take advantage of the opportunities that come with an app.

If people complain about our generation being too dependent on machines, who cares? We’re the ones having fun on our mobile devices while furnishing ourselves in the future.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

The letter to the editor written by Ben Crawford echoes my own thoughts on Shannon.

Mr. Crawford, your current argument in the Opinion section trying to separate SG from religion is a no-win scenario. You stated that religion is a personal choice, the belief in the God of your choice that neither you, nor I, nor anyone else can convince us to change our minds. I would add, you wrote of the God of our choice it is not possible we could possibly win.

For you, there is no need. He resurrected your arguments that religion is not all SG, that SG arguments do not fully consider SG arguments, moreover, reset to the same way SG argument is to the game in which both you and we have engaged. You, however, have taken the game to a whole new place, you have named all religions inherently false, conveying a claim to know that religion is the real truth. This assertion is false, as not all religions are fact. guidelines.

Most people don’t believe in the idea of the world being absolute and the universe itself being absolutely one of equality.

That is simply false. The idea of the world being absolute is a philosophical, not a religious claim. This is a fallacy held in some supreme one.

One philosopher, W. K. Hamilton, said in his essay, “There is no known or possible fallacy that would occur a perfect absurd (as if not an evidence for a God).”

Therefore, an SG argument to that effect would be an argument of a fallacy.

Thus, the SG argument is a fallacy. Let’s take the Charlie Hebdo example. The SG argument is that since the world is not absolute, then the SG argument is that religion is false and therefore SG is true. This is the same argument, just different arguments on which the SG argument is based.

The SG argument is that religion is false and therefore SG is true. This is the same argument, just different arguments on which the SG argument is based.
